

Dear Prospective LSE Guerrilla,

We have a problem, and we need your help to solve it.

A philosophical rift has opened within our group which has the potential to fracture LSE's burgeoning guerrilla movement into two competing factions.

We cannot allow this to happen. If it does, conventional teaching wins.

LSE Guerrillas have commented that our usually disciplined force is now “confused and divided” after having “spent too much time reading 19th-century political philosophy”, a development that is likely to delight elements of the LSE establishment intent on seeing us disappear from campus.

The split formed during a meeting to establish our position on the role between the student and the school. The first group argued that students should collectively use their power to seize the school for themselves, using the means at its disposal to teach as many students as possible; the second instead argued that students should ignore the school entirely and enter into voluntary contracts with LSE professors, thereby avoiding the coercive aspects of the school whilst still obtaining an education for themselves.

The arguments have now heated up to the point where some guerrillas have spoken of a potential ‘civil war’ within our group, with two mysterious leaders emerging to lead each faction. Fortunately, the pair have decided to settle their differences democratically – and this is where you come in.

We need more guerrillas to bolster our movement and to decide its future. If you've read this far and think you have what it takes, here are the instructions:

- Meet at the bandstand on Lincoln's Inn Fields for 16:30 on Wednesday 28 May. Make sure to bring £5 (to get into the venue) and your oyster card (to get there).
- Form a queue. There is likely to be a lot of interest, so be early to avoid disappointment.
- An LSE Guerrilla will join you at 16:30 and give those of you who have shown the most promise and arrived earliest a dossier containing a ticket and information on where the lecture will be held and directions on how to get there.

Good luck - you'll need it,

THE LSE GUERRILLAS
