Population, Education and Development: Addressing the Interactions

Education is a key determinant of international development. This Seminar presents new projections of populations by age, sex and four levels of educational attainment for more than 120 countries and a series of population-development-environment (PDE) case studies that comprehensively assess the role of population and education relative to other factors in the struggle for sustainable development. It is argued that most concerns about the consequences of population trends are in fact concerns about human capital. Only by adding the "quality" dimension of education to the traditionally narrow focus on size and age structure can some of the long-standing population controversies be resolved.
