EDUCATION

2019 (Expected) Ph.D. Political Science, Department of Government, LSE

Thesis title: “Low carbon for the long term: The comparative political economy of climate policy investment”

Abstract: Why do some countries do much to address long-term problems like climate change while others do little? This thesis offers a novel theoretical account of the political drivers of long-term climate policy investments across high-income democracies. It argues that political institutions and electoral incentives are key and systematically structure the ability of governments to adopt low-carbon policies that translate short-term costs into long-term benefits. It fills a large gap in the comparative politics literature, which has paid little attention to the looming problem of climate change.

Supervisors: David Soskice, Kai Spiekermann and Joachim Wehner

Research interests: Climate change policy, long-term policy, comparative political economy of high-income democracies, comparative capitalism, institutions, electoral competition, state-business relationship

Jan-April 2017 Visiting Doctoral Student, Department of Political Science, University of California, Berkeley

Advisor: David Vogel

2015 MRes (Distinction) Political Science, LSE

2010 MSc (Distinction) Philosophy and Public Policy, LSE

TEACHING

- The Politics of Economic Policy (GV227), LSE, 2015-16

Second year undergraduate course. Examines political explanations for changes in macroeconomic, financial and regulatory policy in the high-income democracies since the early 1980s. Particular attention is paid to the role of ideas, interests and institutions.

I taught one one-hour class per week for around 10 students for the full academic year. I developed my own teaching materials. In my evaluations I received a score of 1.3, which is higher than the average for the Department of Government (1 is “very good”; 5 is “very poor”).

- Capitalism, Democracy and Equality: The Political Economy of the Advanced Nations (IR102), LSE Summer School 2015-18

Introductory undergraduate course. Introduces students to the complex and conflictual relationship between capitalism and democracy across the advanced economies. Particular attention is paid to the ways in which politics shapes cross-national variation in income inequality.

I taught two 1.5 hour classes per day for three weeks during Summer School. I had around 20 students per class. I developed my own teaching materials. I consistently received evaluation scores higher than the average for the Government Department and the School as a whole (available upon request).

- Teaching interests:
 - Climate change, environment and energy policy (especially in comparative perspective)
 - Comparative political economy of high-income democracies (especially welfare states, inequality, varieties of capitalism, institutions and electoral politics)
 - Public policy and public administration (especially in comparative perspective)
