

Global Policy Lab: Mobilising Global Brainpower at LSE

What we are about

The Global Policy Lab (G-POL) aims to harness the world's combined brainpower to generate fresh thinking and research-based policy solutions to urgent global challenges. Global collaboration and international institutions are under threat from both sides: emerging economies has been questioning their underrepresentation in global decision making for quite some time, but some advanced economies, have also started raising questions about the benefits of globalization and its supporting international system.

Drawing on LSE's Nobel-prize winning faculty, G-POL engages with core policy institutions, senior policymakers and leading academics in both advanced and emerging economies to generate new thinking and sustainable solutions. Genuine collaboration between advanced and emerging economies is crucial to the development of innovative research and policy design. Emerging economies already account for more than half of the world's GDP and should assume a greater role commensurate with their growing economic and political heft.

G-POL aims to serve as a laboratory for developing novel approaches, engaging in cutting-edge research and the design and testing of policy interventions, with the aim of helping emerging economies grow a strong research-based voice and shape the agenda. We co-design research and policy experiments and particularly encourage peer-to-peer transfer of knowledge across emerging economies.

In our first year, we have:

- Facilitated the first-ever research collaboration on cross-border policy spillovers between the central banks of China, India and Russia. To achieve this, we have brought together leading academic institutions and researchers in these countries and in advanced economies.
- Led research on growth and structural transformation in emerging economies, bringing together LSE faculty and five international financial institutions, including regional development banks, the World Bank and the IMF.
- Helped to shape a more evidence-based approach to migration and refugees creating a network of so far 16 lead universities across Europe and the Middle East. Working with the Italian Presidency of the G7, our findings will inform the G7 Summit in Taormina at end-May 2017.
- Established the “Arena” project, addressing the role of evidence in the public discourse, with new research on falsehoods, “fake news,” disinformation and the design of effective responses. In the “Transformation Lab”, academics and policymakers address these challenges in specific countries, currently Tunisia and Ukraine.

“The Global Policy Lab is an important innovation which deserves widespread support.” Rt Hon Gordon Brown, former UK Prime Minister

“We aim to maximize the impact of LSE’s leading expertise across the social sciences by shaping inclusive and locally-rooted responses to the most important and pressing global challenges.” Professor Erik Berglof, Director

Our projects

We have developed a portfolio of proof-of-concept projects selected strategically for their particular mix of global and local engagement and to demonstrate what well targeted, sophisticated high-level interventions can achieve with limited resources:

- Rethinking Global Finance
- Avoiding the Middle Income Trap
- Governance
- Global Migration
- Blue Finance

The Rethinking Global Finance programme demonstrates that we can bring together leading policy institutions and top academics across G20 emerging economies in pioneering research collaborations. Launched in Mumbai in early 2016 by then Reserve Bank of India Governor Raghuram Rajan, this historic initiative has brought together senior management and researchers from the RBI, the People’s Bank of China and the Central Bank of Russia. Current research includes a study of the impact of capital flows using firm level data, distributional impact of monetary policy, capital account opening with distorted financial system, and the changing role of central banks.

The Avoiding the Middle Income Trap project demonstrates that G-POL can mobilise the very best academic researchers alongside regional and international financial institutions - the ADB, EBRD, IADB, the IMF and the World Bank - in a unique research collaboration. This brings researchers from emerging economies together with some of the world’s leading academics in a project that analyses the process by which an economy transitions from middle to high-income status. The Avoiding the Middle Income Trap project is part of the INET Transformation Commission, led by Nobel Laureates Michael Spence and Joseph Stiglitz.

The Governance Project is dedicated to deepening our understanding of the root causes of the ongoing seismic shifts in many political systems in both developed and emerging economies and to designing and testing responses that can help revitalize democracy and foster institutional transformation. The Governance Project currently has three subprojects:

- The Arena project analyses and tests effective counter-strategies to the problems of disinformation, polarisation and hate speech. The project brings together researchers, policymakers and activists to better understand and combat these phenomena;

Anne Applebaum,
Professor in Practice at LSE IGA

- A new Transformation Lab will work with governments, private sector and civil society in countries undergoing fundamental economic and political transformations to support the building of institutions through research and peer-to-peer exchange;
- The Who Owns What project, joint with the UK government and the two NGOs Global Witness and Open Corporates, draws on a new publicly available dataset to analyse critical elements of transparency in corporate and political governance.

The Global Migration Initiative illustrates how G-POL can create a unique network of universities and researchers in both source and recipient countries, currently with 16 leading universities across Europe, the Middle East and Canada. We are also exploring how universities transform themselves as institutions to play a more active role in informing migration policy and facilitating integration focusing on frontier host countries. Our pooled knowledge is already informing policy makers at national and supranational levels, including in the G7 and the G20.

The Blue Finance Project focuses on the largest yet neglected global public good: the ocean. Overexploitation, habitat destruction and pollution threaten marine and coastal ecosystems and challenge coastal resilience. The Sustainable Development Goals mention the ocean, but lack any institutional structure and means of implementation. The failure to align governance, infrastructure and finance at the global, regional and national levels affects particularly seriously emerging and developing countries. We bring together academics,

“The IGA’s Global Policy Lab is the right place to explore many of the most pressing global debates in order to provide an ‘antidote’ to the current wave of populism and autarky.”
Duncan Clark, OBE

policymakers and other stakeholders to come up with sustainable solutions for ocean risk mitigation and adaptation.

We are also working on the global dimensions of “Brexit”, focusing on its implications for services and trade with major economies outside the EU.

Why LSE?

Located in the heart of London, the world’s financial capital, the LSE – the most international of leading universities with more than half of its students from emerging economies – offers the ideal environment for mobilizing the combined brainpower of advanced and emerging economies. LSE attracts academic visionaries and through education populates tomorrow’s academe, government ministries, and corporate boardrooms. LSE’s unique focus and proven impact upon economic and political issues of global importance sets it apart from its elite peers. LSE faculty are leading contributors to policy design on critical challenges that impact billions of people around the globe.

G-POL - a new hub at LSE

G-POL brings together its extensive international network of high-level policymakers and academics with LSE’s world-renowned faculty and first-rate students to fulfil its mission: to join up emerging and advanced economies in designing and testing innovative, research-based and locally-rooted solutions to their common challenges. Through the IGA, G-POL will have access to the capacity of its eight constituent centres, including six regional centres with strong local networks and deep understanding of the local contexts in developing and emerging economies.

G-POL's unrivalled structure allows both LSE faculty and students from emerging and developing economies to engage with their home countries, continuously developing their human capital even after they have returned to their home countries. This will enable them to play a more effective role in their local environments and strengthen their countries contributions to the global debate.

Professor Erik Berglof, Director of LSE IGA

Who are we?

G-POL's core group including its Director, Professor Erik Berglof, former Chief Economist of the EBRD and Programme Director Piroska Nagy-Mohacsi, have extensive hands-on experience in building research capacity and senior policy engagement. Join us!

You can help support LSE's aim to lead the world in delivering high-quality, high-impact and multidisciplinary research and policy initiatives on the most critical of global challenges. We will also invite you to guide G-POL in an advisory capacity.

Funding priorities

LSE has provided significant seed money to start building up the G-POL through 2016 and many of our initial projects have partial and even full funding. We now are looking for individuals, corporations and foundations to support our budding venture of policy-focused high quality research and high impact at this critical juncture:

- Naming the Global Policy Lab
Your opportunity to provide a transformative gift that will truly cement the foundations of the Global Policy lab and enable a step change in LSE's impact through interdisciplinary, international and issue-orientated social science.
- Driving research innovation
Your opportunity to make a powerful investment in path-breaking, world leading research that tackles the most pressing global issues of our times. You enable joint work by global and local researchers under lead scholars.
- Supporting research networks and exchange programmes
Your opportunity to help link up and nurture the next generation of exceptional scholars and policy makers, giving them direct access to real-world settings and issues. You will be placing them on a trajectory to becoming leading lights in the global research and policy arena.
- Fostering engagement and understanding
Your opportunity to vastly increase the reach of the work of the IGA through public events series, weblogs, working papers and training programmes that have the potential to reach LSE's annual audience of over one million people around world.
