

POLIS

Who cares?

Challenges and opportunities in communicating distant suffering: a view from the development and humanitarian sector

June 2012

Shani Orgad and Corinne Vella

With contributions from

Bruna Seu, Frances Flanagan, Leigh Daynes,
Brendan Paddy, Ian Bray and Joe Morrison

Contents

Knowing about and acting in relation to suffering: mind the gap!	1
Forethought	2
UK NGO professionals' voices: challenges and opportunities in communicating distant suffering	3
Portraying distant suffering	5
Relationships with the UK public: a complex journey	7
Managing the NGO image: dispelling the myths	11
Engaging the public in development and humanitarian issues in a crowded space	15
Where next?	19
About the authors	20
Endnotes	21

Front cover images from top left clockwise:

© Anna Kari, Save the Children, see page 18

© Anthony Devlin/PA, Plan UK, see page 10

© Phil Moore / Concern Worldwide, DEC, see page 6

© Timothy Allen/Oxfam, see page 14

Contact us

Polis is the journalism think-tank within the Department of Media and Communications at the LSE.

Since its foundation in 2006 it has pursued a programme of research, lectures, seminars and conferences looking at issues concerning media and development and humanitarian communications.

Polis is a forum for debate for academics, researchers and media practitioners and welcomes collaboration with media and other civil society organizations both in the UK and internationally.

It has a programme of internships, fellowships and visiting research projects.

Contact Polis Director Charlie Beckett at polis@lse.ac.uk

Or visit the Polis website: http://www2.lse.ac.uk/media@lse/POLIS/home.aspx

And the Polis blog: http://blogs.lse.ac.uk/polis

Twitter: @charliebeckett

LSE Department of Media and Communications
lse.ac.uk/media@lse/Home.aspx