'If you open a study guide, it's written in such an instructive manner: in the first week this is exactly what you should be doing, these are the chapters you should be looking at, these are the notes, these are the textbooks. It doesn't assume any prior knowledge. Mastering the study guide was really the key to doing well in an exam.

For an examination where you're expected to write an essay, I think the key is to be honest with the examiner. Write what you're really convinced about in your heart. Because when you're convinced about a particular idea, the ability to be articulate about it in words comes by default. The examiner just wants to see how you think. They want to see how sceptical you are. Even if you're on the wrong side of the argument, it's fine, they really want to see how you can argue your way out and that you have a mind of your own. That could really gain you some bonus points with the examiner, rather than just writing a statement because you think it could probably be correct.'
