

Customised Workshop for British Government Training Authority

Understanding the UK budgetary system

A British government training authority that specialises in providing development and training programmes to government officials throughout the UK needed to bridge a knowledge gap in a specific area. They requested a topical workshop on the workings of the UK budgetary system: how the central government raises funds and, more importantly, how those funds are allocated to various government programmes and initiatives.

LSE Custom Programmes put together a fully customised one-day workshop that addressed the most relevant issues of the UK budgetary system, sculpting the programme so that it fitted in with a larger training exercise which the client was running at the time. The three experts emphasised hands-on application of the knowledge gained and the participants learned how to shape their priorities, access government funds, and deploy them more effectively.

The participants engaged in interactive discussions and comparisons of industrialised and developing countries, drawing parallels with UK practice. A tailored blend of interactive lectures, open-floor discussions and group exercises was achieved through careful study of individual profiles and preferences. The benefits of engaging with LSE faculty were supported by the expansive background and experience in international issues on offer.

At a glance

Participants: 50

Participant level: Senior officials

Duration: 1 day

Location: London